Course Overview	This course will explore how international social issues are shaped by political and economic systems, institutional frameworks, and individual choices. We will examine the role of international politics, international economics, and international cooperation in addressing global challenges like poverty, inequality, and development. Through case studies and real-world examples, we will explore complex political and social interactions and their global impact. This course invites students to engage in critical thinking and informed debates about potential solutions to pressing international social issues.
Course Objectives	This course aims to equip students with a critical understanding of how international social issues like poverty and inequality are shaped by political and economic systems, institutional design, and individual agency. By analyzing diverse approaches to global challenges, students will develop the ability to evaluate the social impact of international politics on societies worldwide. Ultimately, the course seeks to empower students to engage in informed analysis, research, and debates about potential solutions to contemporary international social issues.
